RE: Proposed Name Change – Water Resource Recovery Facility

In the wastewater industry, there is a big push to re-brand utilities and do away with the “dirty” image. The core mission of the wastewater industry is to protect public health and water quality by treating society’s pollution; while the waste stream utilities must manage is certainly dirty, this is a clean water industry. By shedding the dirty image, the hope is that the public will better value the services provided and support necessary investments in the infrastructure.

One way in which the wastewater industry is changing this perception is by renaming wastewater treatment plants as “water resource recovery facilities.” The philosophy is that fundamentally treatment plants recover a valuable resource (water) from a major societal waste stream. This is particularly important in arid/drought stricken areas where water is scarce, but it is relevant here as well where Lake Erie and our other waterways are valuable community assets. The Water Environment Federation – which is an international water quality organization – now refers to wastewater treatment plants as water resource recovery facilities in all of its publications. The enclosed article discusses this change.

The Division of Sewerage Management is proposing that all Erie County Sewer Districts rename their wastewater treatment plants as water resource recovery facilities. Enclosed is a suggested resolution for the Board’s consideration. Additionally, in 2016 the County is starting its Charter Revision process and the Division of Sewerage Management would like to explore a possible name change for the Division as a whole. More details will be discussed later in the year.

RESOLUTION
BOARD OF MANAGERS
ERIE COUNTY SEWER DISTRICT (ECSD) No. 8

WHEREAS, the core mission of wastewater water treatment plants is to protect public health and water quality; and
